Factors Affecting Impulse Buying Behavior

Impulse buying is an interesting topic within the subject consumer behaviour. The study of consumer behaviours has led to conclusions as to why consumers act as they do when it comes to shopping. To describe, impulse buying is an unplanned buying behavior resulting from a powerful urge to buy something immediately. According to the study, the increasing number of consumer purchases are being made without advanced planning.

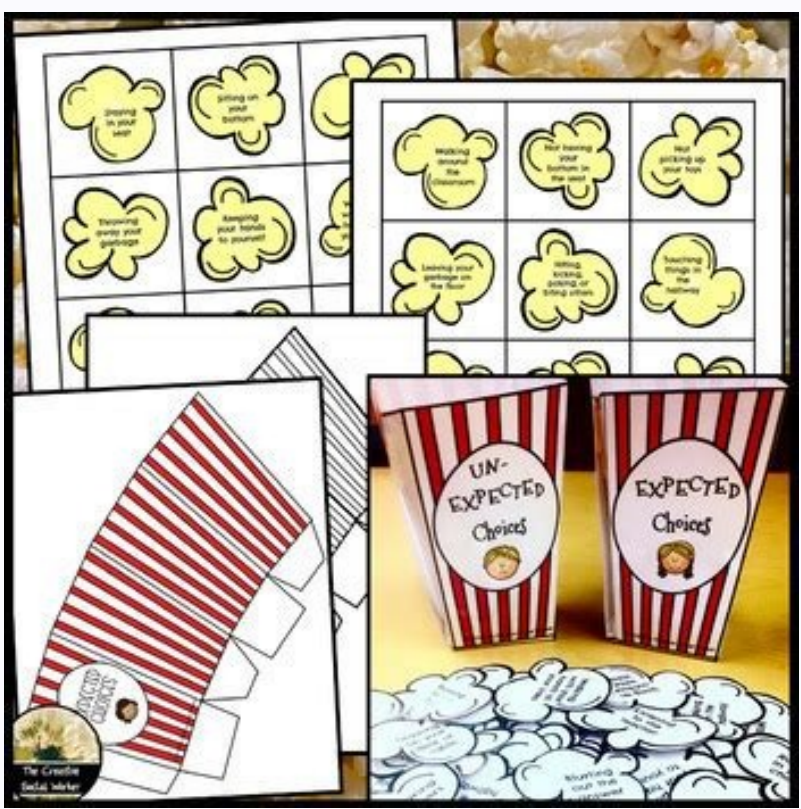

An industrial economist Hawkins Stern (1967) developed 4 types of impulse buying behaviors. First, pure impulse buying – a true novelty purchase, or escape purchase, that is very different from the typical purchasing pattern. Second, reminder impulse buying – occurs when a shopper sees an item or remembers something that reminds on item needed. Third, suggestion impulse buying – occurs when a shoppers see a product for the first time then imagine a need for it. And fourth, planned impulse buying – when a shopper makes a purchase based on special prices, coupons, and other promotions.¹ However, there are various factors that could affect impulse buying.

Store environment is one of the influence factors affecting the impulse of buy. It can be seen that impulse buying varies depending from the size of stores.² The study compared the effects of small versus large size of stores on impulse buying behavior show two different outcomes. In small stores, price has significance influence in leading consumers to make an impulse buying. Shoppers might think they can see every product, know their options, then has no real preference and just go with the cheapest thing. The case with the large stores, products display play an important role in triggering consumer to buy impulsively. The large size of store, the variety of products, make consumers are triggered to buy impulsively because they have many choices to buy.

Store environment such as music background, store layouts, and fragrance also have influence on impulse buying behaviors. It might sounds simple, but it does have effects on consumer preferences. A study shows that there are two causes that could trigger consumer to
